Read the following passage and answer the questions given below it.

Some people imagine that English is likely to become the lingua franca of India. That seems to me a fantastic conception, except in respect of a handful of upper-class intelligentsia. It has no relation to the problem of mass education and culture. It may be, as it is partly today, that English will become increasingly a language used for technical, scientific and business communications, and specially for international contacts. It is essential for many of us to know foreign language in order to keep in touch with world thought and activities, and I should like our universities to encourage the learning of other languages besides English – French, German, Russian, Spanish, Italian. This does not mean that English should be neglected, but if we are to have a balanced view of the world we must not confine ourselves to English spectacles. We have already become sufficiently lopsided in our mental outlook because of this concentration on one aspect and ideology, and even the most rabid of our nationalists hardly realize how much they are cribbed and confined by the British outlook in relation to India.

But however much we encourage the other foreign languages, English is bound to remain our chief link with the outside world. That is as should be. For generations past we have been trying to learn English and we have achieved a fair measure of success in the endeavour. It would be folly to wipe the slate clean now and not to take full advantage of this long training. English is also today undoubtedly the most widespread and important world language, and it is gaining fast on the other languages. It is likely to become more and more the medium of international intercourse and radio broadcasting. Therefore we must continue to spread the knowledge of English. It is desirable to learn it as well as possible but it does not seem to me worthwhile for us to spend too much time and energy in appreciating the finer points of the language. Individuals may do that, but for large numbers it will be a needless burden on them and will prevent them from progressing in other directions.
